“A delicate book in which children can draw the strength needed to overcome or anticipate grief.”
— Littérature Enfantine Blog

“A tender reflection on the passage of time, death that lurks around and the importance of transgenerational links.”
— Ricochet Jeunesse Website

I love when my grandmother tells stories. She knows many of them. True stories.

A little girl and her grandmother share a moment of tenderness. The dialogue between generations allows the child to find her place among her family and to understand the circle of life.

- A positive, loving take on old age
- A powerful message about death and legacy
- Stylized illustrations using a tricolore palette

Marido VIALE | Author

After many years working in pharmaceuticals and traveling overseas with her husband and children, Marido Viale started working at a library. One day, she realized that she wanted to write stories; but only for kids. She thinks it will prevent her from getting older... But really, it's because she's still a little girl who likes to tell stories.

Xavière BRONCARD | Illustrator

Xavière dreams of owning a studio. In the meantime, she works from her dining room, amidst her inks, pencils and paper. The glasses are filled with brushes, the spoons serve as presses and the engravings have taken the place of the linen on the clothes rack. The canvases are lined up in the chimney and the tubes of paint, piled up on the sofa... So call before paying her a visit!
